

Are VIRUSES Alive? Informational Text With GUIDED READING

Are VIRUSES Alive?

LEVEL: GRADE 5 ADAPTED Although a simple question, this is a complex one that has been known to spark debates among many in the scientific community for years. Let's attempt to answer it.

Let's first consider a virus. What exactly is it? A virus is a small particle of nucleic acid, such as DNA or RNA, that is surrounded by a protective protein coat called a capsid. Some viruses act as infectious agents. Let the bacteria, the different types of organisms including plants and animals. The common cold, the flu, the are examples of viruses that you might have heard of before.

Are VIRUSES Alive?

Directions: Answer the questions and complete the task below.

1. Before you begin reading, consider the question: are viruses that reproduce considered to be alive or not?

2. What are viruses?

3. What are some examples of viruses?

4. What are the characteristics of living things?

5. How do the characteristics of viruses compare to the characteristics of living things?

6. Write your conclusions about: Should you consider

Now that we know what a virus is, let's look at what it takes to call something a living thing. There are numerous characteristics that all living things have in common. First, living things are made up of units called cells. All cells, no matter how simple or complex, have a cytoplasm and genetic material that is enclosed by a phospholipid bilayer called the cell membrane. These structures of a cell are essential for organisms to maintain stable conditions, a process which we call homeostasis of living things. Furthermore, living things have a metabolism found in plants, animals, and microorganisms like up the tissues. Tissues make up organs. Different organs work together for the organism as a whole. Viruses do have the ability and genetic material. Nonetheless, they are not made up of cells and are not able to maintain homeostasis on their own.

Viruses are able to sustain life, growing, and reproducing. The difference is, however, viruses do these things by using the host cell.
